Personal pronouns and “flexible minds”: Shaping Māori academic identities

Meegan Hall
Victoria University of Wellington
Māori academic identity research

Research with Māori academics from various New Zealand universities and disciplines:
• ethnicity an important component of their identity;
• dual identities as both Māori and academics;
• not a question of whether their Māori identity may impact on their identity as academics but how it does.
“mental rigidity”

vs

“flexible mind”

“sharply delineated identities simultaneously”
(p. 1095)

“maintain multiple intellectual enclaves”
(p. 1100)

Method of analysis

Interpretative phenomenological analysis (IPA) used to code interview data collected from Māori academic staff about their academic experiences, aspirations and needs.

Process

(1) Read and re-read

(2) Note exploratory comments
   a) Descriptive (e.g. key words, phrases, explanations relating to the interviewee’s experiences, events, objects etc)
   b) Linguistic (e.g. pronoun use, pauses, repetition, tone, degree of fluency, metaphor)
   c) Conceptual (reflexive engagement, i.e. your interpretation of the underlying issues/ideas arising from the data)

(3) Identify emerging themes

(4) Identify super-ordinate themes

Expressions of Māori academic identity

How does personal pronoun usage reflect the intersection between Māori cultural and academic identity?

Does the “flexible mind” approach come at any personal or professional cost to the Māori academics involved?